WINNING THE WAR, LOSING OUR SOULS

James M. Wall

According to the opinion polls, Americans widely supported the war in the Persian Gulf. But from the time Iraq invaded Kuwait in August 1990, through the start of the U.S. air attack and the ground offensive, the CHRISTIAN CENTURY presented a different perspective on events in the Middle East and the implications of military action against Saddam Hussein. James M. Wall's editorials in the CHRISTIAN CENTURY from July 1990 through June 1991 serve as both a record of the drift of public discussion during this period and a reminder that there were voices that did not share the national enthusiasm for a military solution.

●

"American journalists have little reason for pride in their profession's record before, during and after the gulf war. Deference and submission were the most obvious marks of that performance. For independent moral commentary we need to look to men like Jim Wall and journals like the CHRISTIAN CENTURY. They save our honor." —Garry Wills, syndicated columnist and history professor, Northwestern University
